The funeral of Patrick Hand, a well-known Dublin bricklayer, occurred on August 15.

Successful fairs were held August 19 at Ballybay, County Monaghan, and Rathmullen, County Donegal.

The Tyrone fair at Six-Mile-Cross on Saturday, August 19, had a very large attendance and good sales were made.

The summer meeting of the Royal Society of Antiquaries was held this year in Belfast, lasting from August 15 to 18.

The Earl of Arran has discovered gold on his Irish estate in combination with copper, and a new kind of marble has been found in fair abundance near Galway.

John J. Doyle was buried in Glasnevin cemetery on Monday, August 14. He was a member of the firm of Farley & Co., of Dublin, and his death followed an illness of short duration.

There is great dissatisfaction throughout the West of Ireland over the high rates charged by the English railways, which are evidently intended to kill the growing fishing industry.

The remains of the late Isaac McAlister were sent from Dublin to Danganon for interment in the family burying ground August 14. The deceased was seventy-seven years old.

The manufacture of artistic furniture and rustic ornaments from Irish gorse is the invention of J. H. Parnell. Specimens of this work were exhibited at recent shows in Dublin and formed the subject of much admiration and favorable comment.

The Dublin Catholic Boys' Brigade, with its two bands, accompanied by a full muster of officers and boys, took part in the public procession in honor of Our Lady's Assumption at Mount Argus on Sunday, August 20. They were highly complimented upon their fine appearance.

One of the attractions during the Dublin horse show last week was the annual fashionable gathering on Lord Iveagh's grounds on the 22d. The Lord Lieutenant and Countess Cadogan graciously gave their patronage, as did also the Countess of Fingall, Countess of Mayo, Lady Iveagh, Lady B. Balfour and Lady Power.

One sad fatality resulted from the late lightning storm, the victim being a farmer named Boyd, who had about a hundred acres of land in Dunrathmond, a district of the country lying between Monaghan and Ballybay. It seems that Boyd, who was about forty years old and married, came into Monaghan for the purpose of training some sheep for Belfast. After dinner he proceeded to go home on foot, and nothing further was heard of him until he was found lying on the road at Feragh. The Monaghan police were communicated with, and Sergeant Flynn with a couple of men proceeded to the scene on a car. They found the unfortunate man in a shocking condition. He was lying face downward; his hat was torn in shreds; his clothing was literally torn from his body; his boots were ripped and shattered; the hair was burned off his head, and his upper lip was split in two. The roadway in front of where the deceased was lying was ripped up for several yards by the electric current. David Joseph Geary, aged thirty-six, died in Tooting last week. He was born in Limerick and educated at Castleknock and Blackrock Colleges. He went to London about ten years ago to join his cousin, Edward Downey, in his publishing business. He remained with Ward & Downey when Mr. Downey left that firm in 1890, and had since been their Secretary and manager.
